

I oppose the FCC plan to remove indecency regulations for public broadcasting. I believe that many people are affected by this kind of decision and that the interests of society as a whole should be considered above the interests of any minority. Public broadcasting disseminates information and entertainment to the widest audience. The content should be palatable to the most picky of tastes because it is not geared to a specific audience with specific tastes. Cable and pay per view channels have a specific audience that pays for their content. My children and the elderly are subject to whatever is being broadcast on public television. I oppose the lowering of decency standards because they will affect the most vulnerable and defenseless groups in society (children and the elderly). I think the FCC should take a stand on decency when called to do so by the public who has given them the authority to make such decisions. When the FCC chooses not to represent the public good, the people may choose to take back their authority to act for the people.
